

Advance Publicity for “Walking Hadrian’s Wall”

Hadrian’s Wall was built right across the north of England by the Romans in the Second Century AD to protect their settlements from barbarian raiders from what is now Scotland. Stretching 84 miles from sea to sea, the ruins of the wall are now paralleled by a modern walking trail. We will look at what the Romans were doing in Britain, how and why they built the wall, and how it survived through the centuries. Then we’ll take a fully illustrated walk along its whole length. It’s an epic 9-day adventure with lots of spectacular photos and interesting stories!

Richard Jordan is a former President of the Etobicoke Historical Society and a former Toronto Star local history columnist. His feature articles on historical subjects have also appeared in the Saturday Star and the Sunday Star. He says, “I like to look at a place and imagine how it changed through time – who once lived there and how the residents live now.”
